

Loss of vision in degenerative diseases of the retina and optic nerve is often permanent, in part because of the failure of regenerative repair in the visual system. We have been studying intrinsic and extrinsic mechanisms of survival and axon growth of retinal neurons, from trophic signaling to transcription factors. Here we review a number of these modalities that are moving towards clinical application.